Like I said before people want information and in order to get this information there is a high likelihood that they're gonna ask questions. In the role of a Question Answerer your job will include:

Identifying Your Topics Of Expertise Let's say someone wanted an answer to a medical related question, chances are they wouldn't be pleased if someone who had zero medical expertise were to attempt to answer. So as to avoid situations such as this, when you sign up to become a personal research assistant most sites will ask you to identify the topics you are most knowledgeable about to streamline only the relevant questions to you.

Since the job of answering questions online is a highly subjective one, there is no standardized amount that you can earn.

You can find them from a simple Google search of websites that will pay you to answer questions. A ton of results will come up and I'm sure you don't have the time to sift through pages of google search results.

To make the process easier for you my top 5 best sites to use based on how much you can earn answering questions are as follows:

One of the most popular question answering sites is Just Answer. What's great about Just Answer is that it is broken down into categories such as Legal, Medical, Mechanic, Computer and so on, making it much easier for the user to ask direct questions to the right person.

There are many other sites and apps that you can sign up to but they tend to pay a little bit less like Weegy, and Clarity but if you just want to test out this
