Virtual football games are much shorter, electronically-generated version of real football games.

For the most part, virtual sports betting provides an exciting, alternative means of entertainment in which you can place quick-fire bets on live, automated matches at any time of the day.

Whereas for normal football, you'll often find that the top betting sites allow you to bet on well over 100 different leagues and competitions from all around the world, with virtual football, there are normally only two – either domestic or international – , and the games are decided automatically by the computer.

The only exception here is Betfred, who offer an impressive 20 different markets for every fixture.

As we've already pointed out, there are a few similarities between virtual football betting and the traditional markets, the most notable of which was already made clear.
