WASHINGTON-Fraudulent online reviews, which deceive consumers and damage compani es' reputations, are a significant problem. While the public and private sec tor have taken some steps to address the proliferation of fake reviews, a new re port from the Center for Data Innovation concludes that state and federal govern ments should strengthen their enforcement actions, partner with the private sect or to develop best practices, and pass legislation to protect consumers from law suits when they leave honest reviews.

"The importance of online reviews has opened a new market for fake reviews that present a dishonest impression of companies, goods, and services," sai d Morgan Stevens, a research assistant with the Center for Data Innovation, who authored the new report. "Companies may turn to employees or bad actors to fraudulently leave positive reviews to boost the image of their products, or neg ative reviews to discredit those of a competitor. These actions both hurt honest businesses and mislead consumers as to the quality of relevant goods and servic es."

Previous research has found that the negative impact of fake reviews has grown o ver the years, likely influencing billions of dollars in consumer spending. The Center's new report breaks down the types of fake reviews that proliferate a s well as other sources of misrepresentation that impact the online marketplace, including the suppression of negative reviews, lawsuits over negative reviews, the harassment of customers, and payments to silence critics.
