U.K. consumer rights group Which? said in a report today that an analysis of hundreds of tech products-including headphones and smartwatches-indicated that search results were being dominated by little-known brands with thousands of unverified five-star reviews.

In one Amazon search for headphones last month, researchers found seven out of 10 products in the results included suspicious reviews claiming to be from customers. One set from a brand called Celebrat had 439 five-star reviews. All were unverified and posted on the same day.

An analysis of smartwatches searched on Amazon, when sorted by average customer review, also showed a deluge of unknown brands. The top four products had dubious reviews.

Use Fakespot: The website is a useful way of scanning the reliability of a review by copying the URL of the product. Using artificial intelligence, it grades results from A (good) to F (avoid) and works for items on Amazon, Best Buy, Steam, Walmart, TripAdvisor and more.

"If you are buying a high-value item, the onus is on you to research it as much as possible," Saoud Khalifah, the CEO of Fakespot, told Newsweek. The Amazon statement added: "We estimate more than 90% of inauthentic reviews are computer generated, and we use machine learning technology to analyse all incoming and existing reviews 24/7 and block or remove inauthentic reviews.
