But did you know that influencers are often paid by the companies selling these products to review them? So how can you be sure that these reviews are even honest?

Not all paid reviews work the same way. Often, a brand reaches out to a specific influencer on TikTok asking if they would like to review their product on social media as a paid opportunity. If the influencer agrees, both parties will negotiate the payment and then the brand will often send the influencer the product for free (although not always), so that they can take pictures or videos using it for the review.

The short answer is sometimes. The long answer is it depends on the specific influencer and the rules of the review that they agreed to. Popular beauty influencer Mikayla Nogueira experienced backlash in February 2023 for posting a review of a mascara claiming it made her eyelashes look so much better, but she was accused of using false lashes.

TikTok comments can be really helpful in creating a conversation and getting more than one opinion on a product. If you see the most perfect review of a product, but all the comments are saying otherwise, the reviewer is probably being dishonest. Commenters aren't the ones being paid, so they are more likely to just be giving their true opinion.

3. Has This Influencer Stated Their Standards When Agreeing To Do a Review?

Many big influencers on TikTok have addressed their standards when they agree to do reviews on social media for payment. These can include not doing reviews for products that they don't like or always being honest in reviews, even if it causes them to lose a business relationship.

Watch TikTok Reviews With Caution

In the end, the best person to decide if a product works for you is yourself. TikTok can be great for help with purchasing decisions, but be cautious when buying something just because an influencer said they loved it.
