But +EV betting is a great way not only to learn the ins and outs of the basic math behind sports betting, but also to make some money in the process in a quantifiable way.

The expected value of your bet is based on the O-vig line (50% in coin flip case)  $T_j T^* BT / F$

Expected value the way I use it is always based on fair lines from sportsbooks and not what I or any other model think will happen.

There are 3 ways (imo) to best assess Pirates under 3.

11, 90% of the time.

DraftKings ran an NBA finals promo where your moneyline bet would get paid out if the team went up 10 points, even if they lost.

Must bet on draftkings: my conclusion is this is a very strong promo with the better play being the celtics at an ev of  $-+36\%$ .

The Half Time/Full Time combination is tough to predict, but that lower chance of winning is of course reflected with more generous returns.

Half Time Result
It's the same premise as the Final Result market, but instead, you're betting on the result at the interval.

Should you back Leeds United to beat Fulham 2-1, and Patrick Bamford strikes late to hand Marcelo Bielsa's side a 2-1 victory, you win.
